The search criteria would be as follows:

1. The user were logon to the NSI Federated Search
2. Once the search screen opened they would set the parameters for their search

The method to see all that has been entered at a particular location or all locations would be as follows:

1. Set a date range for SARs to be reviewed
2. Choose the site or sites to be searched (these are check boxes at the bottom of the search tool)
3. In the case of an eG user they would "uncheck" the eGuardian box so they would not be looking at SARs already in eG
4. Once the parameters are set, the user would choose to search and the federated search would begin
5. The results set would be all SARs, within that date range, for each location selected.

Please stop by to explain – I'm afraid e-mail isn't good for this.

I misunderstood your original inquiry . . . I thought you were talking about the locals, not the FBI. Now that I'm on the same page why would we create a list and then have them go look? Why not just do an "all" search and review the results there?

So, to confirm, we could give the FBI a list of all 6,000 SARs that were not sent to EG and they could look each one up to review it?

(I know this defies any logic given the holding bin, etc., but I have to ask)

We can identify everything about a SAR is the local common box and the user has the ability to know the status of each SAR and whether or not it was sent to eG.

David –

Is there any way to identify the 6,000 SARs in SS that were not submitted to EG, and if so, can a list be given to a SS user that would allow the user(s) to pull up and review those SARs?

Thanks.

Jim
